Attorney General: Four officers fired their weapons while exchanging gunfire with a Maine man on the run.

ROCHESTER -- The Attorney General's office on Tuesday identified the two state police troopers and two Rochester police officers involved last week in the fatal shooting of Douglas Heath. The 38-year-old Maine man had been on the run from police since April, when he failed to attend a court hearing on several judge charges and a warrant was issued for his arrest. On Aug. 20, police attempted to stop Heath, who led them on a 20-minute, high speed chase that ended when he crashed at the intersection of Oak Street and Route 125. According to police, Heath exited the car through the passenger side door and exchanged gunfire with police. State police troopers Haden Wilber and Nathaniel Goodwin and Rochester police officers Geoff Moore and Michael Lambert all fired their weapons, according to a statement from Senior Assistant Attorney General Peter Hinckley. The chief medical examiner had previously found that Heath was struck by multiple bullets. No one else was injured in the firefight. Hinckley said he will release a report on whether the use of force was justified at the conclusion of his office's investigation.
