FAYETTEVILLE, N.C. - A man who was shot by a Fayetteville police officer after stabbing a pregnant woman at an apartment has died.

Lemuel Bunn, 40, of Roanoke Rapids, died of his injuries Tuesday evening at Cape Fear Valley Medical Center, said Sgt. Shawn Strepay, a police spokesman.

The woman, Stephanie Williams, 34, of Fayetteville, is in stable condition at the same hospital. The condition of the unborn child is not known, a police release said.

Police released additional details of the incident in a press release on Tuesday night. The department was also preparing to release to the public a 911 call made by Williams.

Police Chief Gina Hawkins said at a morning news conference that officers responded at 9:08 a.m. to the 911 call from Williams.

"She was being held in her apartment against her will, stabbed numerous times," Hawkins said.

When officers arrived, the woman was still on the phone with the 911 operator.

"(Williams) could hear the officers knocking on the door, and she started screaming at that point," Hawkins said.

The officers forced their way into the apartment and found Williams, bleeding from her wounds, lying on a bed, the updated release said. Bunn had one arm around Williams' neck and was holding a knife, according to police.

Officers told him multiple times to drop the knife, but Bunn refused, police state.

"At that time, an officer discharged their firearm, striking Bunn, and stopping the immediate threat to Williams' life," the release said.

The officer, who was not injured, has not been identified but has been placed on administrative duty, which is departmental procedure.

The police department's policy regarding identifying an officer who is involved in a shooting says, "The name of the involved officer will be released, through a media release by the PIO's office, at a practical time after 48 hours of the initial incident notification."

The State Bureau of Investigation is looking into the shooting, which is standard procedure for any officer-involved shooting.

The police department's Internal Affairs Unit is conducting an internal investigation to ensure all departmental policies and procedures were followed, the release said.

"There is nothing happening right now as far as disciplinary action," Hawkins said. "Our response was on-point, was definitely on-point."

Asked Tuesday morning how the officer was doing, Hawkins said, "If you can imagine being involved in a shooting, it takes a toll on you."

Once the SBI has turned over its findings to the Cumberland County District Attorney, a press conference will be held, the policy says.

Most residents shocked

Access to the building where the shooting happened and others in the same area was restricted on Tuesday as the incident was being investigated. Crime scene tape marked off the parking area, encompassing four buildings.

Officers escorted residents living in the affected buildings to their homes.

Several police vehicles were in the parking lot.

Residents and business owners in the area expressed shock at the incident, but one said there has been trouble there before.

Leslie McDonald, a home health nurse at Primary Choice Inc., said she called the police last week after seeing a man with a knife.

"We get a lot of homeless people and people who wander through here, so it's not surprising," McDonald said. "You would hope that something like that wouldn't happen around here."

Reggie "Rambo" White, who lives in another part of the complex, called it a "quiet place."

"There's no excitement going on," White said. "I never heard of anything like that."

Josh Baez, who also lives in the complex, said a friend of his lives near the apartment where the stabbing and shooting incident happened and knew the people involved.

"He said they were pretty calm," Baez said. "He didn't think they would get in trouble."

The department's last fatal officer-involved shooting occurred in December 2016, near Ponderosa Elementary School.

Police forced their way into the home to find Mark Anthony Hicks, 31, standing over the body of his girlfriend, Amanda Lena Williams, 37, with a knife in his hand. Williams had been stabbed to death.

Officers told him repeatedly to drop the knife, but he refused to do so, and a Taser failed to stun him.

As officers began to try and handcuff Hicks, he lunged at them with the knife and was fatally shot.
